Introduction

The subject of sorcery is among the most complex and intertwined phenomena in human history. Since ancient times, it has been associated with religion, fear, symbolism, rituals, psychological and social authority, as well as concepts related to spirit, energy, envy, illness, and hidden influence. With the advancement of modern science, the concept of sorcery has remained a subject of ongoing debate between religious interpretation, psychological analysis, popular folklore, and philosophical perspectives.

Most traditional approaches to sorcery, however, have fallen into one of two opposing extremes: either reducing it to mere superstition and psychological illusion, or treating it as an absolute supernatural force detached from any systematic analysis of the human structure and the mechanisms through which influence occurs.

This study emerges within what may be called the “Malaysheh Interpretation of Sorcery,” which seeks to reconstruct the concept of sorcery through a structural and methodological framework. This is done by first understanding the human self, then examining how its balance may become disrupted, the possible mechanisms of influence upon it, and the ways through which this balance may be restored.

Within this perspective, sorcery is not viewed merely as spells, charms, or incantations, but rather as an intentional targeting of the balance of the human self, whether through the body, the mind, the spirit, or the complex relationships between them. Furthermore, this model does not dismiss the role of medicine, psychology, or objective life circumstances; rather, it requires the exclusion of clear medical and situational causes before considering the possibility of a hidden influence.

Accordingly, sorcery in this model is not treated as the first explanation for every disorder, but rather as an analytical possibility explored only after examining the individual's prior condition, the nature of the transformation that occurred, and the location of the imbalance within the structure of the self.

First: The Malaysheh Model of the Human Self

The Malaysheh Model of the Human Self considers the human being a multi-layered interconnected structure composed of:

- The body
- The mind
- The spirit

The self, however, is not regarded as an independent entity in itself, but rather as:

“The result of the union, interconnection, and balance of the body, mind, and spirit.”

Within this framework, the mind itself is not considered a separate organ, but rather:

“A system of contemplation and cognition arising from the integration and balance of the heart, the brain, and the nervous system in interaction with the external world through the senses.”

Accordingly, the balance of the self can only be achieved through the dynamic equilibrium among these three components. Any disruption in one of them, or in the relationship between them, may lead to disturbance and instability within the self.

Second: The Deep Meaning of Sorcery in the Malaysheh Interpretation

Within this structural framework, sorcery is not understood merely as words, rituals, or incantations, but rather as:

“An intentional act aimed at destroying the balance of the balanced human self through influence upon the body, the mind, the spirit, or upon their structural interconnectedness.”

It may also be defined more deeply as:

“A process of transferring or directing a destructive influence (an energy of evil) toward a balanced individual with the aim of weakening their psychological, mental, or spiritual balance.”

Thus, the essence of sorcery within this model is based upon:

- Intentional influence upon one aspect of the structure of the self — body, mind, or spirit — characterized by leaving no direct medical cause for the disturbance, but rather leaving behind its effects.
- Targeting balance.
- Transferring meaning or influence into the level of effect.
- Producing disruption within the human structure.

Accordingly, sorcery is not merely a “ritual,” but rather “a process of corrupting the balance of the self.”

Third: The Foundations of Sorcery in the Malaysheh Model

1. The Agent

The individual or entity intending to cause disruption, harm, or targeted influence.

2. Intention

Sorcery cannot exist without a clear intention directed toward influence, corruption, weakening, separation, or control.

3. The Medium

The medium may consist of:

- Words
- Symbols
- Talismans
- Material substances, whether consumed or not consumed
- Personal traces
- Hair

- Blood
- Animal organs
- Or even a social environment charged with envy, hostility, or other forms of harmful influence

Within this model, the material itself is not considered “sorcery” in and of itself, but rather a medium within the process of influence.

Note

For a deeper discussion regarding the influence of certain foods upon the spiritual dimension and the balance of the human self within the Malayshah Interpretation, reference may be made to the program “Anulzimukumooaha” by researcher Ameen Khalid Ameen Malayshah on the Noor Al-Mawraiyat Channel, particularly the episode titled:

“The Essential Reasons Behind the Prohibition of Pork Meat” which discusses the relationship between certain prohibited substances — such as carrion and blood — and their potential influence upon bodily, spiritual, and psychological balance within the proposed interpretive model.

4. The Location of Influence

The influence may affect one or more of the following:

- The body
- The mind
- The spirit
- Or the interconnectedness between two or all three together

5. The Effect

This consists of the appearance of disruption within the overall balance of the self due to an undiagnosed disturbance affecting the mental, bodily, or spiritual dimensions, or all of them in cases where the sorcery is extremely severe toward the targeted individual.

Fourth: The Relationship Between Sorcery and Psychological Balance

The central principle of this perspective is that a balanced individual is generally less susceptible to influence than a person who is already internally collapsed or unstable. However, it is also possible that balanced individuals may become primary targets for malicious individuals or sorcerers.

Therefore, the primary condition for diagnosis includes:

- The existence of a prior state of balance
- Followed by a sudden disturbance
- Without a clear medical or situational cause explaining the transformation

This prevents confusion between:

- Original psychological disorders
- Organic illnesses
- Naturally unstable personality traits
- And sudden states of imbalance in which the possibility of sorcery is explored within this model.

Fifth: Types of Targeting in Sorcery

1. Bodily Targeting

In this type, the disturbance appears through:

- Exhaustion
- Weakness
- Fatigue
- Disturbances in vital functions, among others

Despite this, medical examinations may reveal no clear explanation.

Within this model, the disturbance is considered more “functional” than visibly “organic,” and bodily imbalance may contribute to the collapse of the entire structure of the self.

2. Mental Targeting

This may appear through:

- Disturbance in thinking
- Cognitive confusion
- Unjustified fear
- Behavioral collapse
- Severe personality changes, among others

while lacking a clear neurological or medical explanation.

3. Spiritual Targeting

This is represented through:

- The loss of inner tranquility after its prior existence without clear cause
- Sudden aversion to spiritual stability
- Disturbance of inner meaning
- Collapse of spiritual serenity, among others

particularly in individuals who were previously spiritually stable.

4. Composite Targeting

This is considered the most dangerous form, where the disturbance simultaneously affects:

- The body
- The mind
- The spirit

leading to a comprehensive disintegration of the balance of the self.

In such cases, partial treatment is insufficient, and the individual requires an integrated therapeutic system.

Sixth: Environment and Envy as Forms of Influence

This interpretation holds that the environment itself may become a source of draining the balance of the self through the transmission of destructive influence via the evil eye, speech, and other forms of targeting directed toward the individual, especially when the environment is filled with:

- Envy
- Hostility
- Surveillance
- Constant wishes for harm

This may result in:

- Chronic psychological pressure
- Gradual collapse of balance

- Or unexplained transformations in a person's life

For this reason, some individuals may noticeably improve after:

- Changing environments
- Distancing themselves from harmful individuals
- Or relocating elsewhere

because the environment here is not viewed merely as a place, but rather as “a system of influence.”

Seventh: The Use of Blood, Hair, and Biological Materials

Within this model, materials directly associated with the individual — such as:

- Blood
- Hair
- Nails
- Personal traces

are understood as mediums believed by sorcerers to possess a direct connection to the biological or spiritual structure of the targeted individual.

This perspective also associates certain prohibited foods with the protection of spiritual balance, arguing that some substances may affect the purity of the relationship between the body, spirit, and mind.

Nevertheless, this remains within the philosophical and spiritual framework of the model rather than within definitive laboratory-based scientific proof according to contemporary scientific standards.

Eighth: The Methodology of Diagnosing Sorcery

Diagnosis within the Malaysheh Interpretation is based upon the principle of “methodological exclusion,” meaning:

A condition is not immediately considered sorcery, but rather examined through the following stages:

- Verifying the existence of prior balance

- Observing the sudden transformation
- Excluding medical causes
- Excluding clear situational and psychological causes
- Identifying the location of the disturbance
- Examining the nature and persistence of the effect

Accordingly, “sorcery” becomes a possibility explored only after apparent explanations fail to account for the state of collapse.

Ninth: Treatment in the Malaysheh Interpretation

Treatment within this model is not merely the “removal of a ritual,” but rather:

“The reconstruction of the structural balance of the self.”

Treatment differs according to the location of the disturbance.

1. Bodily Treatment

This includes:

- Supporting the body
- Restoring vital balance
- Physical therapeutic methods
- Cupping therapy intended to remove spiritually corrupted or medically undiagnosed blood
- Traditional herbs within carefully studied limits, particularly those intended to expel harmful consumed substances or cleanse the body from spiritually corrupted material that may have been ingested

2. Mental Treatment

This includes:

- Psychological therapy
- Reorganization of perception
- Removal of fear and suggestion
- Correction of meaning and interpretation
- Seeking assistance from specialists, wise individuals, and experts in psychological understanding

3. Spiritual Treatment

This includes:

- Balanced and continuous connection with metaphysical understanding
- Supplication
- Spiritual recitation (ruqyah)
- Spiritual fortification
- Restoration of spiritual stability
- Strengthening certainty and tranquility

4. Integrated Treatment

In composite cases, the individual requires:

- A comprehensive therapeutic system
- Guided by a deep understanding of the human self
- Integrating the bodily, mental, and spiritual dimensions together

Tenth: Sorcery Between Religion, Science, and Structural Analysis

This model does not claim to provide definitive laboratory proof of sorcery according to the contemporary experimental scientific framework. Rather, it attempts to:

- Build an analytical model for understanding unexplained disturbances
- Study the influence of environment, suggestion, fear, and symbolism
- Relate these factors to the structure and balance of the human self

Likewise, the model does not dismiss:

- Medicine
- Psychology
- Social circumstances

but instead considers them the first step in understanding and diagnosis.

Conclusion

The Malaysheh Interpretation of Sorcery seeks to move beyond superficial popular understandings toward a structural model linking sorcery to the balance and imbalance of the human self.

Within this perspective, sorcery is not merely mysterious rituals, but rather an intentional targeting of the body, mind, spirit, or the relationship between them, leading to the collapse of psychological and existential balance.

This model also establishes important methodological conditions, most notably:

- The existence of prior balance
- The exclusion of medical and situational causes
- Before considering the possibility of sorcery

Accordingly, true treatment is not merely the pursuit of rituals and symbols, but rather:

“The reconstruction of the internal balance of the human self.”

The subject of sorcery, according to this interpretation, remains a vast and complex field requiring further study, analysis, and elaboration, particularly regarding the mechanisms of influence, the limits of diagnosis, and the relationship between the self, spirit, body, and the surrounding environment.

Final Note

I am currently working on developing a more systematic and precise elaboration of the concept of sorcery, its mechanisms of influence, methods of diagnosis, treatment, and prevention within an analytical framework grounded in the Malaysheh Model of the Human Self.

God willing, this work will be presented in a broader and more detailed form in a comprehensive book that will be made available in the near future.
